Teaching – 1969 to May 1993:

My teaching record prior to coming to the School of Public Health reflects the breadth of my early academic interests and my commitment to aligning my teaching assignments with departmental needs. I taught policy courses at the PhD, MA and BA levels in Quebec, France, and the U.S.A. While a professor at McGill University, I taught Urban Politics, Business and Politics, Statistics for Political Scientists, Political Science Methodology, Qualitative, and Quantitative Social Science Methodology for Sociologists (in the sociology department), Comparative Politics, Western European Political Systems, Social Movements, and Political Socialization.

During my years at the University of Québec, I taught the following courses: American Government and Policy, Social Movements, Political Participation, Social Forces and Political Life, Post-modern Political Science, Elections and Political Parties (United States, Quebec and Canada), Statistics, Methodology, Philosophy of Science, and Epistemology.

As a Visiting Professor, I taught a graduate social science methodology course at the University of Ottawa. As a Visiting Professor at the University of Haute Normandy in Rouen, France I taught Latin American Politics, American Government Policy, and Social Science Methodology. While a Visiting Professor at the University of California, Irvine in 1986, I taught Political Theory, Post-Modern Political Science, and Latin America.

Being responsible for teaching American Government and Policy at the University of Quebec was especially challenging because most students, who are French Quebecois, found it difficult to read English. I contributed to solving this problem by working with a group of professors, all of whom taught American Government at French language universities, to write a French language text for such courses. Our book opened up the possibility of understanding American politics and policy not only to French Canadian students but to those in France and French-speaking Belgium as well. While teaching in French was difficult, it was also stimulating and rewarding.
